PARIS LETTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

August 3rd

Were it not that the journals assure us of the fact, we might perhaps die in blissful ignorance that we are in the midst of general elections, so great is the happy, dead calm in the country. On examination there appears to be no cause for an opposite state of things. The question of the form of Government having been resolved, the nation certainly displays no passion for reform: it leaves these to the natural work of time. Politicians are clearly more advanced than constitutions. Again, the combat will on the whole be no so much a contest as a scramble for seats between republicans, as the monarchists admit in advance, by their representative organs, they go to the poll, not to win, but to defend the honor of their flag. It is Gambetta's party that counts upon a serious augmentation. The late Chambers had the drawback of possessing several minorities out of no fixed majority; hence the inconsistencies of its conduct. If the general elections only remedy that defect, the appeal to the nation will not be love's labor lost. As yet, candidates have presented no definite declaration of faith; perhaps they keep back their pledges till the last moment arrives for winning what they can. The delay clearly shows that there is no burning question on the tapis, and that electors lean towards no violent solution of reforms, no ugly rushing towards innovations, but progress without precipitation, legislation without impetuosity, respect for prejudices, and toleration for differences.

Matters are calmer in Tunisia, and follow their natural course; the French continue to occupy the coast line, and would not well not to extend their movements to the interior of the country, but leave that advance, or role, to the Bey's most trusted troops. The occupation of Gabes and Djérba cuts off the sources from which insurgents past and present received their supplies of war material. This ought to second the views of the Porte in its anxiety to keep Tripoli in order. Djérba is a very rich island, occupied by 45,000 heretical Mussulmans, and who are chiefly weavers or farmers. At low water canals can be made across to the main land. The island is rich in every kind of delicious fruit; the olives are famous, and unsurpassed for quality in the Regency; the date yields the celebrated liqueur Lagnai, produced by bleeding the date tree; the wine prepared is said to have much resemblance with that of Samos. Djérba also produced the shell fish, whose purple dye rivalled that of Tyre itself.

The present might be called the season of luggage; not a cab, not an omnibus, but has travellers laden with portmanteaus, hat-cases, or bags, all like John Gilpin on pleasure bent, and with minds it is to be presumed more or less frugal. The "Chant du Départ," if not more popular, is certainly more apropos than the "Marseillaise" or the "Beau Nicolas." The only literature in demand is apparently a time-table; the guide-book does not appear to be in much request, as the aim of the voyager is, not so much to go to any particular place; as to go anywhere out of Paris, and so be considered respectable. There are people who make a goodly selection of their penates, parade them on a trap, so as to be seen by friends and acquaintances, and then disappear to the outskirts, the world forgetting by the world forgot, during a fortnight or three weeks. On their return, they, like all travellers, indulge in wonderful descriptions of places they have never visited and of aristocratic society in which they have never mixed. The pious fraud amuses them.

A scholar in Paris is perhaps just now as scarce as a deputy: this year legislators and pupils have been liberated simultaneously. The scholars have certainly books and wreaths to prove they have won honors during the expired twelve months. It is an excellent plan to moratorium the distribution of prizes in French schools with all that can add importance and honor to the event; it certainly stimulates pupils and leaves a most salutary impression and sunny memory behind. Nowhere do I perceive this more evident than in the Ecole Professionnelle of Versailles, an institution not yet twenty years old and founded by its director, M. Bertrand, who had the insight and sagacity to anticipate the wave of practical reform which is now passing over the educational regime of France, thus powerfully contributing to the success of that advance. Without Government aid, but confident in the soundness of his ideas, M. Bertrand commenced operations with only one pupil, and to-day has 200, all that his repeatedly enlarged establishment can accommodate. He proposed that every department in France ought to have its professional school; he led the way for the Seine and Oise, whose chief town is Versailles; his programme was eminently practical: to prepare youth for the professions of life as mixed to their capabilities or their means; thus from the earliest age, the engineer, architect, merchant, banker, agriculturist, chemist, professor, &c., is practically familiarized with the lines of his future life. Classics are replaced by living languages, taught by resident native professors; if a parent desires, however, his son can be instructed specially in dead languages; but the whole aim and tendency of the curriculum of studies is practical; pupils are familiarized with things, not names; every lecture is an object lesson. At the annual distribution of prizes which has just taken place at the crowded theatre of Versailles, presided over by M. Leon Say, President of the Senate, the local Deputies and Senators were present; the chief public functionaries, and the leading notabilities. The Portuguese Ambassador, and Dr. Dominique Calvo, relative and professional successor of the famous Dr. Rood, testified for the excellent results of the Ecole Professionnelle. Monsieur Leon Say in a spirited sketch of foreign schemes of education, felt assured France would have nothing to envy any nation, were she endowed with professional schools; Senator Laboulaye, administrator of the College of France, also bore testimony to the efficacy of practical education, as a necessity not only for his own country, but for the age; these views were corroborated by the assent of the leading inspectors of the French Academy. From the report read by the director, not only have graduates of the Versailles Professional School taken first places at the entrance examinations to the State colleges, but when alumni, they uniformly maintained such position. Nay more, in the positions of life, whether in the civil, military, financial, commercial or professional world, the graduates of the Versailles School are distinguished by their success and promotion. A very handsome tribute was paid to a pupil of the school whose marked ability secured him a lieutenantancy in the Military Engineers; he was the first officer killed in Tunisia, and deplored by his commander; all the pupils stood up during the delivery of the tribute to their comrade, Detelle, and many tears fell fast. The institution has also a section of English pupils; they won a great many prizes, and President Say congratulated them on their victory; the lads are healthy and happy looking; having conversed with several of them I found their knowledge of French remarkably proficient: the English Church is close to the School. In the management, of the pupils, the director evidently has inspired himself with the views of Dr. Arnold; there is no harshness in his system; corporal punishment, solitary confinement, and such barbaric plans of correction between director and pupil; an appeal to the latter's honor, loyalty, and sense, and the recalcitrant retires a wiser and better student. After the distribution of the prizes, a very sumptuous banquet succeeded at which M. Leon Say presided. The following is an interesting history. Some 3 years ago, M. Gambetta received twice a week a letter from a shepherd boy, residing near Malmaison; the letters were written on scraps of newspaper borders and posters; the writer's uniform theme was, he had taught himself to read, cipher, and write, while herding, and implored M. Gambetta to enable him to satisfy his thirst for knowledge; struck by the persistence and sincerity of the strange applicant, M. Gambetta ordered inquiries to be made: found the lad's history to be correct as his conduct was exemplary. He entered the boy at the Ecole Professionnelle as his protégé, and that pupil has achieved his admission into the State Normal School after a brilliant examination.

M. Go, the actor, has been decorated in a roundabout fashion; he receives the red ribbon of the Legion of Honor, not as a compliment to his histrionic talents, but to his position as professor at the Conservatoire, where he has classes preparing pupils for the stage. The army does not relish the idea of admitting comedians to participate in the glory of an order ostensibly instituted for the brave. It is questionable, however, if an actor who may kill people with laughter be not as useful a citizen as he who annihilates with powder and ball. Soldiers have no objection to enjoy the advantages of artists, but exclude them not the less from rewards. In the cicerone here the glories are either English or American; one has a very exemplary family of three girls; they never miss church or Sunday-school, where one of the girls is a teacher, and not the least a skilful rider. Madame Blanc has left a fortune estimated at 50 millions francs; her estates will be sold and divided between her three children. She was a lady of great energy and business habits; she determined to have Princes for her two daughters, and succeeded. Having settled her children, she decided to re-marry; she was not above 50 years of age, but she decided her second husband must have a title; the gentleman she loved had not this qualification, so she purchased for him an Italian property that conferred the title of Count. The preliminaries had been all settled for her wedding; the purchase of the estate effected, when she suddenly died. Is there a fatality attending fortunes made by even farming gambling tables,

The Government is to be congratulated on its success in obtaining a conviction against one of the professional abortion doctors of Paris; he has been condemned to five years solitary confinement. The new Prefect de Police is winning golden opinions by the severity with which he is clearing the streets of the capital of bad characters. In the swimming baths on the river, in order to escape thieves, bathers generally deliver their money and valuables to a care-taker receiving a receipt in exchange. A thief entered the stall of a gentleman luxuriating in head-bath, priggish his receipt, received money &c. to the value of 6,000 francs, and disappeared. Expulsions from French colleges are not hanging matters in France; the present astronomer national and the academicien Maxime du Camp were expelled in their salad days. Come! Ignorant states that passports are only beneficial for rogues. This year the best barometer is boasted to be a frog in a wide mouthed bottle filled with water, and a ladder for it to climb to a rest. Each wing of the latter is a "degree," from variable up to fine weather. The Montreuil peaches--that rose of fruits, have appeared; they are a kind of jelly in the mouth when eaten, and thus have no superior. The kernels and their shells boiled down in vinegar have the reputation of curing biliousness--a rival to be found only in the virtues of the incomparable oil Maccassar.
